

Doctor honored for care by Community Care of North Carolina

Published: Monday, October 13, 2014 at 4:08 p.m.

Community Care of North Carolina has named 10 recipients for its 2014 Healthcare Quality Awards, including a doctor from Lexington.

Dr. Stephen Hsieh received the award.

The inaugural awards recognize exceptional performance in a variety of categories, including patient service and education, health care analytics, effective collaboration on a multi-disciplinary team and improving access to care in rural areas.

"We are proud to honor people who work hard each day to improve the quality of care for their patients," said Dr. L. Allen Dobson Jr., president and CEO of CCNC. "These award recipients demonstrate exemplary dedication to caring for North Carolina's needy populations and have made their local communities better places to live. CCNC wishes to recognize the tremendous efforts being made by local care managers and participating practices. It's clear that exceptional healthcare delivery is happening in cities and town all across our state."

Nominations were reviewed by a distinguished panel of judges including Dr. Robin Cummings, state Medicaid director, N.C. Department of Health and Human Services, CCNC Central Office leadership and CCNC Network leaders. Recipients will be recognized by the North Carolina Community Care Networks Inc. Board of Directors during an awards luncheon Dec. 3 in Raleigh.

For more information on the Healthcare Quality Awards, visit CCNC's website.

Copyright © 2016 The-Dispatch.com — All rights reserved. Restricted use only.